POETRY EDITED BY FLORINE MELNYK

Rest, Peace

When the sun drops in wait and the shop doors are locked, fleshy and irreverent the dead flood the streets and in their wake any misconception that this generation hasn't had a defining moment is consumed. They jostle for position, tattered flags catching and pirouetting in moonlight.

Arms snag on mailboxes gates trap heroes' toes.
The ceremony proceeds for those who know where to look and the sibilant call grows but, still, a mother can't cry too loud for fear of waking the president.

The eyes' backlights will burn out by dawn the chaos will slow—myriad, minute tufts of grass and pebbles will sink back into place.
The best time to be okay with choices is before the dawn breaks, so America, turn your fear to steel.

Untitled #161

They found a dinosaur heart in South Dakota once, perfectly preserved, still held in the protective curves of its ribcage.
I don't know much about hearts outside of words like aorta and by-pass, chambers and ventricles. I know that some men have plastic hearts, some have baboon hearts, and some rare men barely have hearts at all. But I think that I know my own heart and hope that when they crack the sternum to unearth it, the black spots of hatred and weakness are small and few, hope the whoosh of air that escapes sounds not unlike her name, hope there is still an errant pulse or two to beat out in some odd jazz time, hope that when its weighed on that clinical scale, its measured by more than just ounces and pounds.
